With acceptable designs for warehouse compartments of this construction, fire frequently can be confined to the section in which it originated. Hence the compartment is still the unit of the warehouse, as it is in case of the fire-resistive construction. The same general influences control its preferred size and proportions except that its limitations must be fixed entirely by walls, the floors not serving to separate compartment units, in case of multiple story construction. 42 BULLETIN 801, U. S. DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE. Slow-burning construction--sometimes called mill construction--consists of substantial masonry walls and heavy timber framing with thick and closely laid floors and roof, all arranged so that no concealed spaces, or pockets, are formed. Although this may be considered a brief definition, there are a number of essential details--which should be adhered to if the building is to be worthy of its name. For example, timbers which are carried at the end by walls should be supported there in such manner that failure and falling of the timber would not damage the wall. The value of proper construction, in this particular, is shown by the photograph in Plate XXII, figure 1, in which case heavy timbers resting on corbels have fallen without damage to the wall though an entire compartment was consumed. It is true that the first requisite is control of the fire, but a close second...
